What is Leadership?

Leadership is Both a Science and an Art

- Bass & Stogdill's Handbook of Leadership: Theory, Research and Managerial Applications cites approximately 8,000 studies on leadership.
- Some managers may be effective leaders without ever having taken a course or training program in leadership.
- Some scholars in the field of leadership may be relatively poor leaders themselves.
- Leadership will always remain partly an art as well as a science.

Question 1: The Current Landscape

Based on your observations or knowledge from your home country (or countries you've lived in), what is the current presence of women in middle and senior management? Can you name any well-known female leaders (in business, politics, or other sectors) from your country, and how are they generally perceived by the public?

Question 2: Personal Stance

From your personal perspective, do you believe it is important to have more women in leadership positions? Why or why not?

Question 3: The "Pipeline" Argument

It is often said that women "leak" from the leadership pipeline—meaning they start their careers in equal numbers to men but are underrepresented at the top. In your opinion, what are the most significant factors that cause this "leak"?

Women Leaders

‘WOMEN
ARE BETTER
LEADERS’

Former US President Barack Obama said that women are ‘indisputably better’ leaders than men and said that most of the problems in the world came when men were in power. Speaking at a private event in Singapore, Obama reportedly said that there would be a general improvement in living standards and outcomes if women ran every country.

Women Leaders

One of the most important factors that seems to impede the advance of women and other minorities into leadership roles is bias. A bias that might be labeled “the narrow band of acceptable behavior” is depicted below.

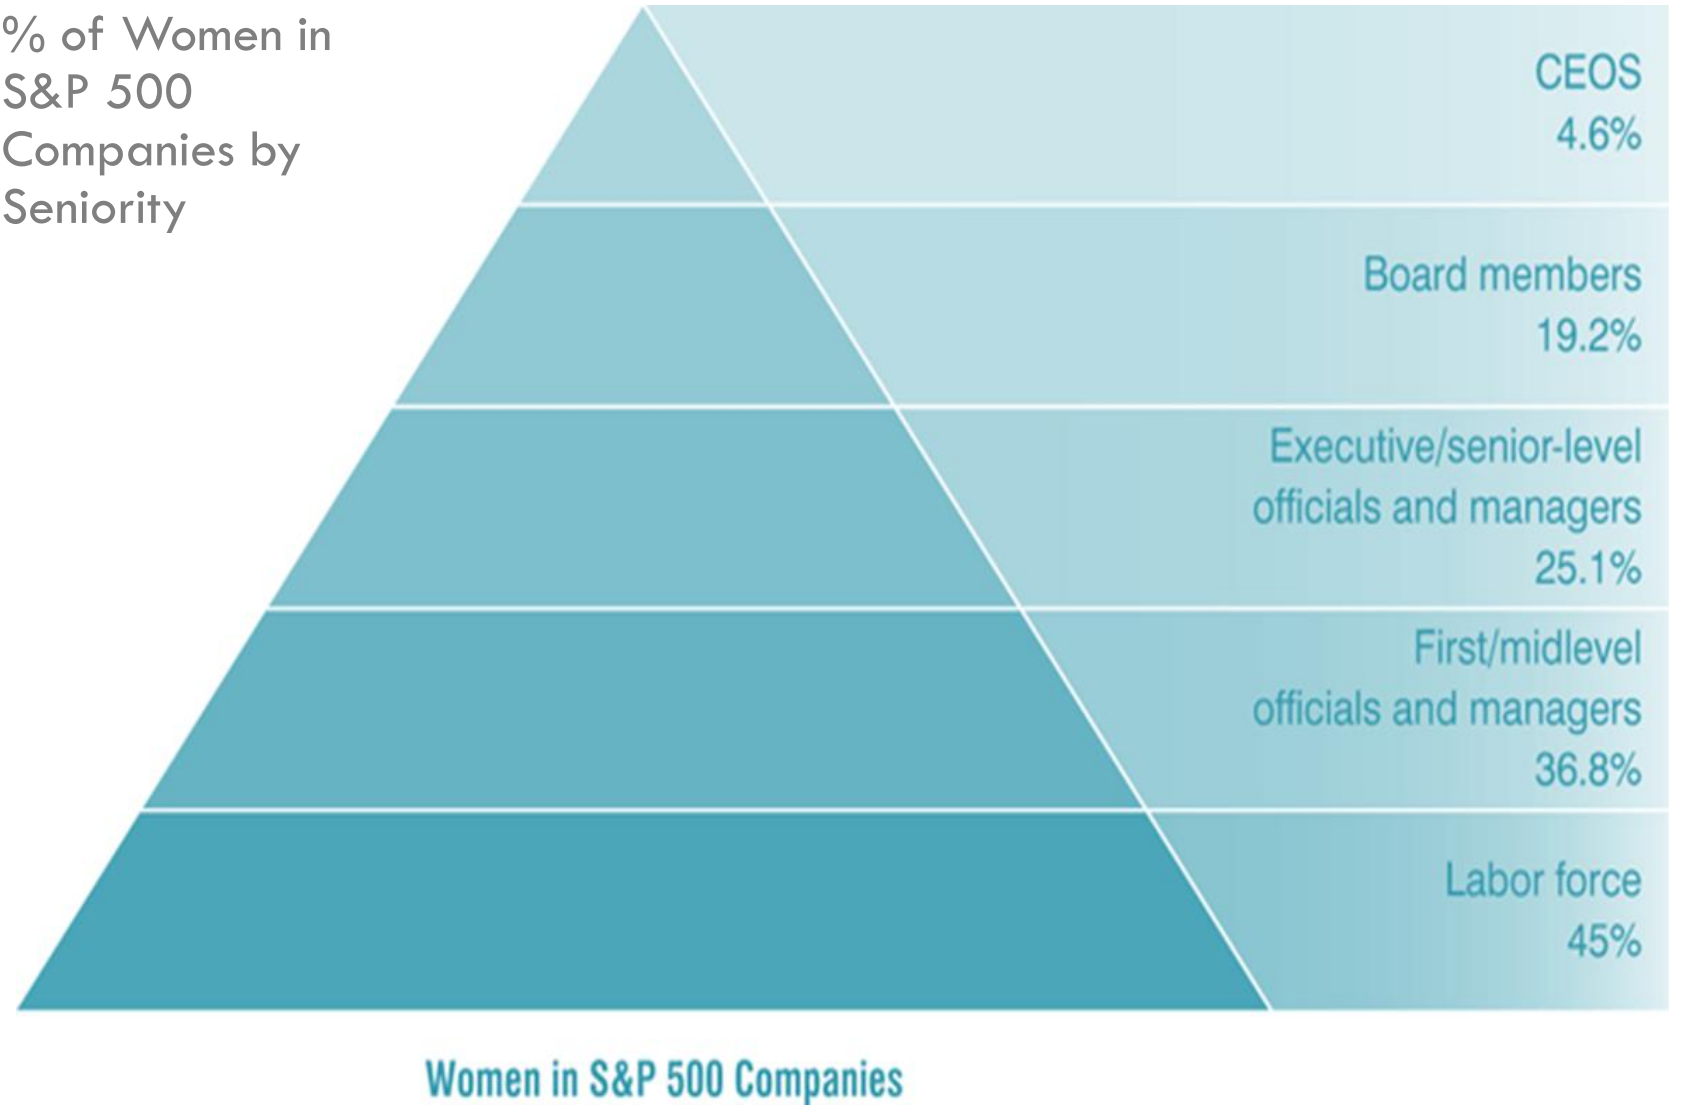

Women Leaders

- Women are taking on leadership roles in greater numbers than ever before.
- Problems still exist that constrain the opportunity for capable women to rise to the highest leadership roles in organizations.
- Research shows that there are no statistically significant differences between the leadership styles of men and women.

No Simple Effective Leadership

- There is No Simple Recipe for Effective Leadership
- Leadership must always be assessed in the context of the leader, the followers, and the situation:
 - A leader may need to respond to various followers differently in the same situation.
 - A leader may need to respond to the same follower differently in different situations.
 - Followers may respond to various leaders quite differently.
 - Followers may respond to each other differently with different leaders.
 - Two leaders may have different perceptions of the same followers or situations.

No Simple Effective Leadership

- The right behavior in one situation is not necessarily the right behavior in another situation.
- Though unable to agree on the one best behavior in a given situation, agreement can exist on some clearly inappropriate behaviors.
- Saying that the right behavior for a leader depends on the situation differs from saying it does not matter what the leader does.
