

Textual

Synthesising information

In this module, you are learning to make your writing coherent and cohesive. Your written assessments need to refer to other authors' ideas to support your claims. Although engaging with others' ideas is an interpersonal meaning (Interpersonal Module), it is explored in the Textual Module because different ideas need to be organised. They need to be coherent and cohesive; that is, the information needs to be synthesised.

1. Watch the video which explains how to synthesise ideas.
2. Check your understanding of synthesising by unjumbling a paragraph with multiple sources.

Essential: Synthesising others' ideas into a coherent whole

For your written assessments, you will need to include evidence to support your claims. Sometimes, you will need to refer to two authors in the same paragraph. It is important that you can synthesise the information coherently and cohesively.

What do you already know about synthesising information? Think of three points.

Synthesising

1. Synthesising means combining many ideas.

4.

Watch the video to see if your ideas are mentioned. You can start watching at about 4' 20".

The following paragraph is jumbled (not in order). Organise the parts of the paragraph in a way that the evidence is synthesised well.

who discusses the cultural practices that background a critical thinking approach, whereas Benesch (1993) explores the cultural practice a little more precisely.

He points out the democratic nature of the ‘learning process’ that underlines critical thinking.

For McPeck (1981), critical thinking is “reflective scepticism” ;

Another perspective on critical thinking is from Atkinson (1997), that is, McPeck claims that it is a choice about whether to believe what is written or not.
